

FREQUENTLY ASKED QUESTIONS

Can a hospital discharge someone with dementia?

Yes, but the discharge should include appropriate planning that considers the patient's medical condition, safety needs, cognitive status, and available support.

What if my loved one refuses placement?

Capacity should be evaluated by the treating medical team. A person who lacks decision-making capacity may require a legally authorized decision-maker to participate in care planning.

What if I cannot safely care for my parent at home?

Many family caregivers are unable to safely manage complex dementia-related behaviors. There may be community resources and care settings better suited to meet your loved one's needs.

Does Medicare pay for long-term care?

Medicare generally does not cover custodial long-term care. Coverage depends on the type of services needed and individual eligibility. We can help families understand available care options and potential resources.

CONTACT US

If your loved one is facing hospital discharge and you are concerned about their safety, don't navigate this alone.

Our experienced team helps families identify appropriate senior care options, understand the discharge process, and find the right level of care for their loved one.

Contact us today for compassionate guidance and personalized senior placement assistance.

WE'RE HERE TO HELP.

Because every senior deserves the right care.

480-212-6933

support@directseniorservices.com

www.directseniorservices.com